Therefore the solicitude, unexpected enough, which we will be no longer free to decline.

"Every one has remarked the solicitude, unexpected enough, which the French Govern, ment has evinced for the Southern Confederacy, and its oft-repeated attempts upon the English Government, fortunately repelled by the latter, to give as united recognition to the slavebolding Republic of which Mr. Jefferson Davis is the Fresident. Fublic opinion in France has not understood the rasson for this preference. In principle the South is founded upon slavely—an institution that is immoral and prosoundly opposed to our ideas and our manners. It is the South that has commenced the rupture with the North. Undoubtedly, fin point of view of the production of cotton, the South can interest us. But that question interest England still more than us, and yet he has not wished, up to this time, to recognize the Bouth; and it is she who has stopped the impatient ardor of the French Government in that direction.

"On the other hand, and admitting that the South may form a separate State, and that the recognizion of France may sid her in doing so, it is certain that our presence in Merico will be still more disagreeable to her than it can be to the Republic of the North. In fact, the sfave-holding South has only one chance of living and resisting the hostile brethren from whom to the Republic of the North. In fact, the shave holding fouth has only one chance of living and resisting the health brethren from whom it excits to separate; and that is to expand and propagate around it is domestic insultation. Slavery, restricted, will be secretly undermined or violently overthrown by the North. The South can live only by assuming the offensive. It has long recognized that fact; and its efforts to acquire or conquer Cuba, Nicaragua, and the small Central American Republics, and the absorption of Texas, already consummated, show clearly enough that the South comprehends the necessity that weighs upon it, and that drives it to conquest and to the propagands of alavery.

"If on the contrary the South compagands of slavery."

"If, on the contrary, the South succumb and the great Republic be reconstituted, we cannot expect any better fortune. It will not be, indeed, for the purpose of apreading slavery, which it will have sholished at home, that it will mease our trans-Atlantic pupils, but rather for the purpose of repelling European influence, of maintaining intact the more or loss authentic Monree doctrine, and perhaps, also, of giving employment to the generals and the five or aix hundred thousand soldiers who have contracted the habits of war, and whom the close of the civil war will have left without employment.

"Let us bring back our troops to Europe; they will not be at any loss for employment; and if Mexico falls back again into disorder, iet not France be drawn into a solidatary which nothing justifies, nor be paralyzed by a transatiantic Aigeria, which she would have to protect against enterprising and formidable neighbors."

The siege is proceeding with desperate energy, and the defence is as fierce as the assault The enemy, it seems, has been able to throw few shells into the city from a distance of fir miles, and we are told that Gen.
